had before told so strongly in his favor was wanting. If a man so far forgets himself as to use threats to a woman, he must not be surprised if he gets into trouble. Of course, the jury had given a verdict of "Not now the jury had given a verdict of Not guilty," there was no more to be said. There was no doubt he was a very lucky fellow, and the jury had given him the benefit of the doubt. Still, if he hadn't done it, who had killed Margaret Carne? Such was the general opinion, and al-though Ronald had still some staunch ad-herents in his own neighborhood, the tide of feeling ran against him.

Two months after the trial, Mrs. Mervyn died, broken down by grief, and while this naturally caused a renewal of the talk, it heightened rather than otherwise the feel-ing against ber son. The general verdict was that it was his doing; whether he killed Margaret Carne or not, there was no doubt that he had killed his mother. All this was doubtless unfair, but it was not unnatural; and only those who believed thoroughly in Ronald's innocence felt how hard this additional pain must be to him,

Immediately the funeral was over, the two girls moved away to London, and the house was advertised to let, but the odor of the recent tragedy bung over it. No one cared to take a house with which such a story was connected. A month or two later there was a sale of the furniture; the house was then shut up and lost to the county. Ten days after the trial it was announced in the Gazette that Ronald Mervyn had retired from the service upon sale of his commis-sion. No one had seen him after he had left the court a free man. His horses were sold week later, and his other belongings forwarded from the regiment to an address he gave in London. His mother and sister had few days later gone up for a day to town. and had met him there. He had already written to them that he intended to go abroad, and they did not seek to combat his

"I can never come back, mother, unless this is cleared up. You must feel as well as I do that I cannot show my face anywhere. I am surprised that I got off myself, and indeed if it were not that I am sure I never got off my horse that night I should sometimes suspect that I must for a time have been really mad and have done what they accuse me of. I have already sent down a detective to the village. There must be some clew to all this if one could only hit upon it, but I own that at present I do not see where it is to be looked for. I do not believe it was done by some passing tramp. I agree with every word that was said at my trial in that respect.

"Everything points to the fact that she was deliberately murdered, though who ex-cept myself could have entertained a feeling of animosity against Margaret, God only knows. There is one comfort, mother, and only one," he said, with a hard laugh. "I can set our minds at ease on one point, which I have never felt sure about before, that is, that I have not inherited the curse of the Carnes. Had I done so, the last two months would have made a raving lunatic of me, whereas I have never felt my head cooler and my reason clearer than I have since the day I was arrested. But you musn't grieve for me more than you can help, mother; now that it is over, I feel more for you and the girls than I do for myself. I have a sort of conviction that somehow, though I don't see how, the thing will be cleared up some day. Anyhow I mean to go and lead a rough life somewhere, to keep myself from brooding over it. The weight will really fall upon you, far more than upon me, and I should strongly advise you to shut up the house, let it if you can, and either come up here or settle in some place—either Brighton or Hastings—where this story will soon be forgotten and no one will associate your names with this terrible business." About that time a stranger arrived at Carnesford. He announced that he was a carpenter from the North, and that he suffered from weak lungs, and had been recommended to live down South. After staying for a week at the Carne's Arms he stated that he liked the village so much that he should settle there if he saw a chance of making a livelihood, and as it happened that there was no carpenter in the village, the idea was received with favor, and a week later he was established in a cottage that happened to be vacant. As he was a man who seemed to have traveled about England a good deal, and was well spoker and informed, he soon took a good position in the place, and was even admitted to form one of the party in the snuggery, where he would talk well upon occasions, but was specially popular as an excellent listener. When spring came there was a fresh sensation. The gardener at the hotel, in dig-ging up some ground at the edge of the shrubbery, to plant some rhododendrons, there turned up the missing watch and jewelry of Margaret Carne. It was all buried together a few inches below the soil, without any wrapper or covering of any kind. Captain Hendricks arrived at Carnestord as soon as the news of the discovery reached him, Reginald Carne was himself away, having been absent ever since the trial took place. Most of the servants had left at once; the old cook and a niece of hers alone remaining in charge, and two stablemen from the garden also staying in the house, Nothing came of the discovery, but it, of course, renewed the interest in the mystery of Margaret Carne's death, and the general opinion was that it was fortunate indeed for Ronald Mervyn that the discovery had not been made before his trial, for it completely demolished the theory that the murder was the work of a burglar. It was possible, of course, that such a man, knowing the active hue and cry that would be set on foot, and that it would be dangerous to offer the jewelry for sale, and still more dangerous to keep it about him, had at once buried it, intending to go back some day to recoverit, for, as Reginald stated at the trial, the missg jewels were worth £1,500.

But had they been so hidden they would assuredly have been put in a box or some sort of cover that would protect them from the damp, and not have been merely thrust into the ground. Altogether the discovery greatly heightened, instead of diminishing, the impression that the murder was an act and as she went about her work at home, Hesba would sometimes tell her that she looked more likr a woman of 50 than a girl of 19; but her mind had been lightened from the burden of her terrible secret, and she felt comparatively happy. She spent much of her time over at the Forresters', for the old man and his wife were both ailing, and they knew that there was little chance of their ever seeing their son again, for the gamekeeper, who had been injured in the ponching affray, had since died, and as the evidence given at the inquest all pointed to the fact that it was George Forrester who had struck the blow that had eventually proved fatal, a verdict of "Wilful murder" had been returned against him.

Ruth's conscience was not altogether fre as to her conduct in the matter, and at the time of Mrs. Mervyn's death she suffered much. As for Ronald Mervyn himself, she much. As for Ronald Mervyn himself, she had little compassion for him. She would not have permitted him to be hung; but the disgrace that had fallen upon him, and the fact that he had been obliged to leave the country, affected her a little. She had been greatly attached to her mistress, who had treated her rather as a friend than as a servant; and that he should have insulted and threatened Margaret was in her eyes an offense so serious that she considered it richly deserved the punishment that had befallen

Until she heard of Mrs. Mervyn's death that see heard of Mrs. Mervyn's death she had scarcely considered that the innocent must suffer with the guilty, and after that she lelt far more than she had done before that she had acted wrongly in keeping the secret, the more so since the verdict returned against George Forrester in the other case had conducted the case had rendered the concealment to some extent futile. But indeed Forrester and his wife did not suffer anything like the pain and shame from this verdict that they would have done had their son been proved to have been the murderer of Miss Carne. Public opinion, indeed, ran against pouching as against drunkensess or calisting in the army, or other wild conduct; but it was not considered as an absolute crime, nor was the result of a fight, in which a keeper might be killed by a blow struck in self-defense, regarded as a murder, in whatever point of view the law might take it. Still Ruth suf-fered and at times told herself bitterly that although she meant to act for the best, she had done wrongly and wickedly in keeping had done wrongly and wickedly in keeping George Forrester's secret.

Three months later, to the regret of all Carnesford, the carpenter, who, although not a first-rate hand, had been able to do the work of the village and neighborhood, suddenly left. He had, he said, received a letter telling him he had come into a little property up in the North, and must return to see after it. So two days later the cottage again stood vacant, and Carnesford, when it wanted a carpenter's job done, was obliged to send over to the next village for obliged to send over to the next village for a man to do it. VERY PLAIN TALK.

Showing the Outline of a Route Which is Often Followed. When a person with a delicate constitution has a tendency to catarrh or consumption-whether this tendency is inherited or results from taking cold easily-it is noticeable that that person invariably loses flesh and loses strength, showing that the nutrition is interfered with.

In such a case the sufferer should at once be placed under influences that will restore the defective nutrition and tend to invigorate the constitution.

It is to be remembered in every case the presence of catarrh is an evidence of predisposition to consumption, and no matter how slight the attack may be, it should be treated with the greatest care and the treatment should be con-tinued until all traces of the catarrh have disappeared.

If the catarrh is allowed to reach the small-est tubes in the lungs—which condition is in-dicated by the spitting up of a yellow material—then immediate attention to the malady is demanded, or serious lung trouble will result. Catarrh is, mue times out of ten, the cause Catarrh is, nine times out of ten, the cause that produces consumption, and hence no one can afford to neglect a case of catarrh, however slight. It is easily cured, if taken in time and treated regularly and correctly by a specialist. If left to itself it is rarely cured without a change of climate, but with each new cold it gets more and more troublesome, extending always a little deeper into the lungs until a cure becomes difficult and sometimes impossible.

"I should like to be treated," a lady remarked the other day, "but I would not like to have my name in the paper." Let it be stated that Drs. Copeland and Blair never publish a name or statement without the full and free consent of the patient, nor do they publish one hundredth part of the testimonials, letters and statements received by them from grateful patients. As observed, the statements given are entirely voluntary, and are given by the patients for publication. Drs. Copeland and Blair would never publish the most emphatic testimonial unless the patient giving it understood that it was to be printed and gave willing consent.
